Dag Heward-Mills and the Theology of Ministry

The Biblical Basis for Free Ministry

Dag Heward-Mills grounds his doctrine of free ministers in Scripture, citing numerous biblical examples and principles: - Jesus Christ as the ultimate example: Christ's ministry was characterized by service, healing, and teaching without monetary gain. He said, "The Son of Man came not to be served, but to serve" (Mark 10:45). - Apostolic example: The apostles, including Paul, often worked secular jobs to support their ministry and emphasized that the gospel should be free of charge (1 Corinthians 9:18). - Principle of stewardship: Ministers are entrusted with divine resources and are accountable to God, not to personal financial gain. Through these scriptures, Dag Heward-Mills advocates that ministry is a calling rooted in service, humility, and divine trust, not wealth accumulation.

Spiritual and Ethical Foundations

The philosophy of free ministers also hinges on ethical considerations: - Avoiding greed and materialism: The danger of ministers becoming overly attached to wealth is a recurring theme, as it can corrupt spiritual integrity. - Promoting equality and humility: Free ministry fosters an environment where ministers view themselves as servants to all, leveling social and economic disparities. - Building trust and credibility: When ministers serve without financial strings attached, it enhances their credibility and deepens trust within the congregation. Dag Heward-Mills often underscores that such a stance aligns with Christ's teachings and promotes a healthier, more authentic church environment.

Practical Implementation of Free Ministerial Service

Operational Models and Strategies

Implementing a free ministry model requires deliberate strategies and structural adjustments. Dag Heward-Mills exemplifies several effective practices: - Voluntary Service: Ministers volunteer their time and skills, often taking up multiple roles—preaching, counseling, evangelism—without payment. - Church Support and Donations: While not paid salaries, free ministers often receive support from their local churches through donations, offerings, or church-funded resources. - Part-Time or Secular Employment: Some ministers maintain secular jobs to sustain themselves financially, emphasizing that ministry does not necessarily have to be their sole source of income. - Community Outreach and Evangelism: Free ministers prioritize outreach programs, community service, and evangelism as core activities, reinforcing their service-oriented approach. Strategies for sustainable free ministry include: - Cultivating a supportive church community - Developing partnerships with charitable organizations - Engaging in self-funded ministry activities - Encouraging congregational participation and ownership

Training and Mentorship

Dag Heward-Mills emphasizes training ministers to embrace the free ministry model through: - Bible Schools and Seminars: Focused on servant leadership and biblical principles of ministry. - Mentorship Programs: Experienced ministers guide newcomers in maintaining humility and spiritual focus. - Resource Sharing: Providing free or low-cost materials to equip ministers without financial barriers. This educational foundation ensures that ministers are well-equipped and committed to serving without undue emphasis on material gain.
